To Whom it May Concern:

This is regards PSNH's request to change the method of billing because energy use has decreased.

Am I missing something?

For years PSNH has advised its customers on various energy saving devices and practices. Congress has outlawed incandescent lights. Everything is about saving energy.

I think PSNH is a good, well-run company. I think they did a remarkable job during last year's outages. But it strikes me as strange that no matter what we do to save energy, we have to pay more in order to keep a power company in business.

Then why the hell do we keep the thermostats down in winter and wear layers of sweaters, and sweat in the summer, saving energy by not using the air conditioner?

It seems to me that I might as well stay comfortable and keep them in business, because I'm going to pay, no matter what.

Just thought I'd let you know.
